El Paso from the Franklins. Footage by Nerrix Digital.

1. Top bar. The name in Jura at the left, six links centred, then the motion switch, the palette, the theme and Post an event, the one filled control. The stills are taken with motion paused, so the switch reads Play.

2. The film. El Paso from the Franklins at dusk; this is its opening still. The headline is Jura Light at 82 px with one word in the accent, over a line of Inter and one cream button. The rail at the left edge tracks the section in view.

Worth planning for.

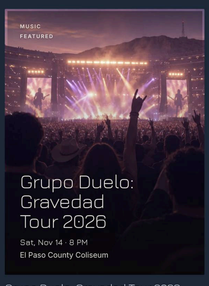

A few picks a week from everything listed: festivals, parades and races that come once a year, and big nights at the city's largest venues. By date:

4. This week, counted. Four figures in Jura at 160 px, each counted from the listings, with the day the sources were checked.

Where it is on.

The Franklins and the valley from above the river, Las Cruces to San Elizario. A light stands on every place with something listed, and the more that is on there, the taller it stands. Turn it, and tap a light.

Tonight 2 · Tomorrow 11 · This weekend 32 · Next 7 days 43

1 more tonight is at a place the map cannot stand a light on: a route, several venues at once, or an address it could not find. The calendar has them all. Ground from open elevation data, places from public address records; the About page credits both.

2 listed tonight
At 2 places, the busiest first.

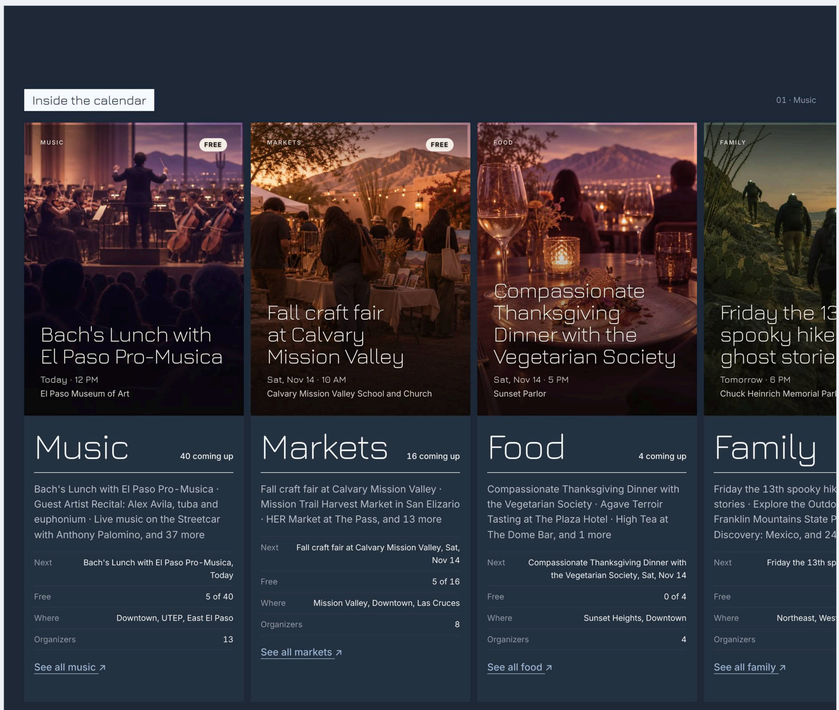

1 El Paso Art Association, Art Junction and 1 more here

1 GECU Arena at the Don Haskins Center

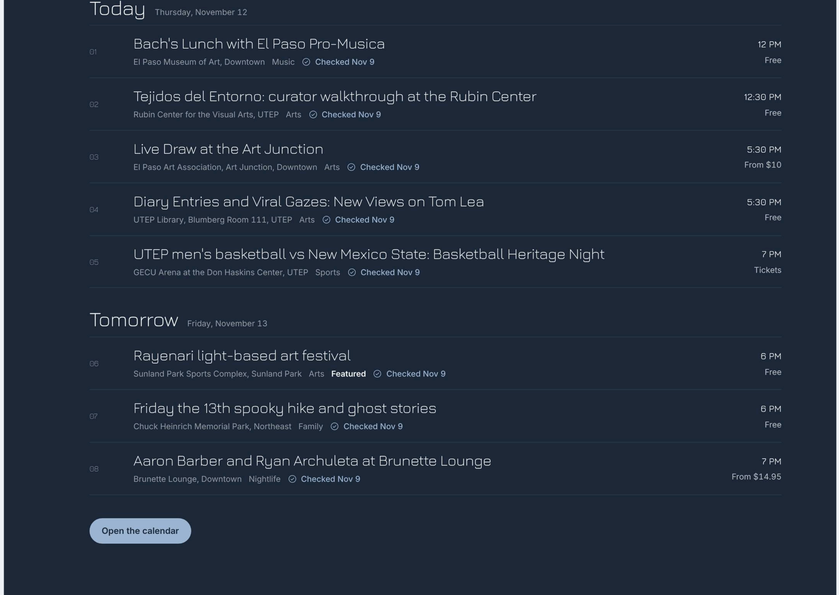

5. Where it is on. The valley at night, drawn from open elevation data. A light stands on every place with something listed, taller where more is on. Chips change the range and the list names the places. Added since the wireframe.

1. Inside the calendar. One frame per category: its next flyer, how many are coming up, how many are free, where, and how many organizers. With motion on, the scroll carries the frames across; still, it is a row that scrolls sideways.

2. Every event gets a page. The next eight as rows: a number, the name in Jura at 26 px, the place, the kind and the day it was checked, with the time and the price at the right.

3. Where next. Three doors in Jura, each with what is behind it on the day.

4. Footer. The closing line over the city at night, two calls, three columns of links, then the year and the credit.

Post it once. It stays yours.

Your page is the source. GPI lists what you post, links back to you, and shows the day it was last checked against your page. Change the place or call it off, tell us through the form, and the listing says so with the next weekly refresh.

1. The pitch in two short sentences of Jura, the second in the accent, with one filled button.

Six things every listing needs.

They are the six things people leave a listing to find, which the field week heard four times out of four.

Who it is for

Ages, who should come, who should not. The workshop that did not say so lost its reader to another page.

What it costs

Free is a real answer, and a filter people use.

Where, exactly

Address, entrance, parking. The twenty minutes people spend checking are the listing's job.

Your page

The link people check anyway. The listing points at it instead of pretending to replace it.

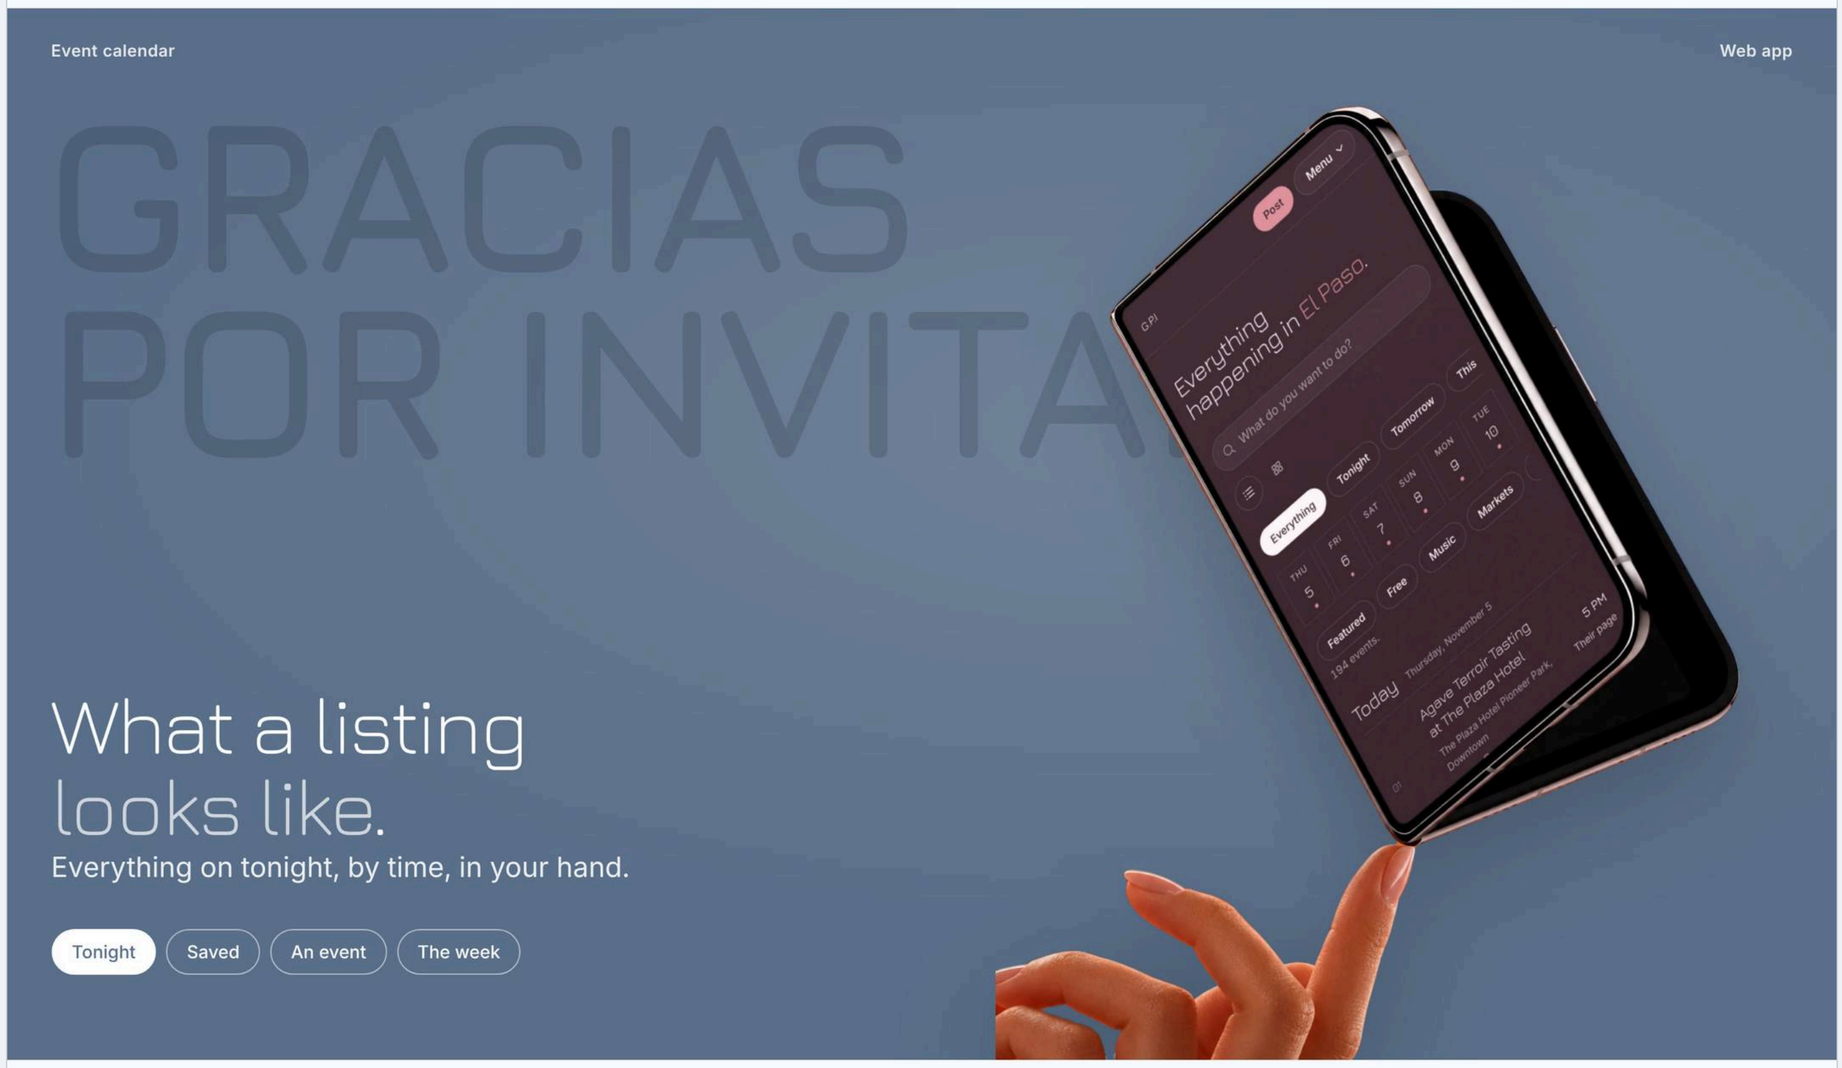

Still on

Confirmed, changed or canceled, dated. The flyer that outlived its correction sent two friends to the wrong lot.

One listing

Corrected on your word, not reposted by others, so the correction travels with the event.

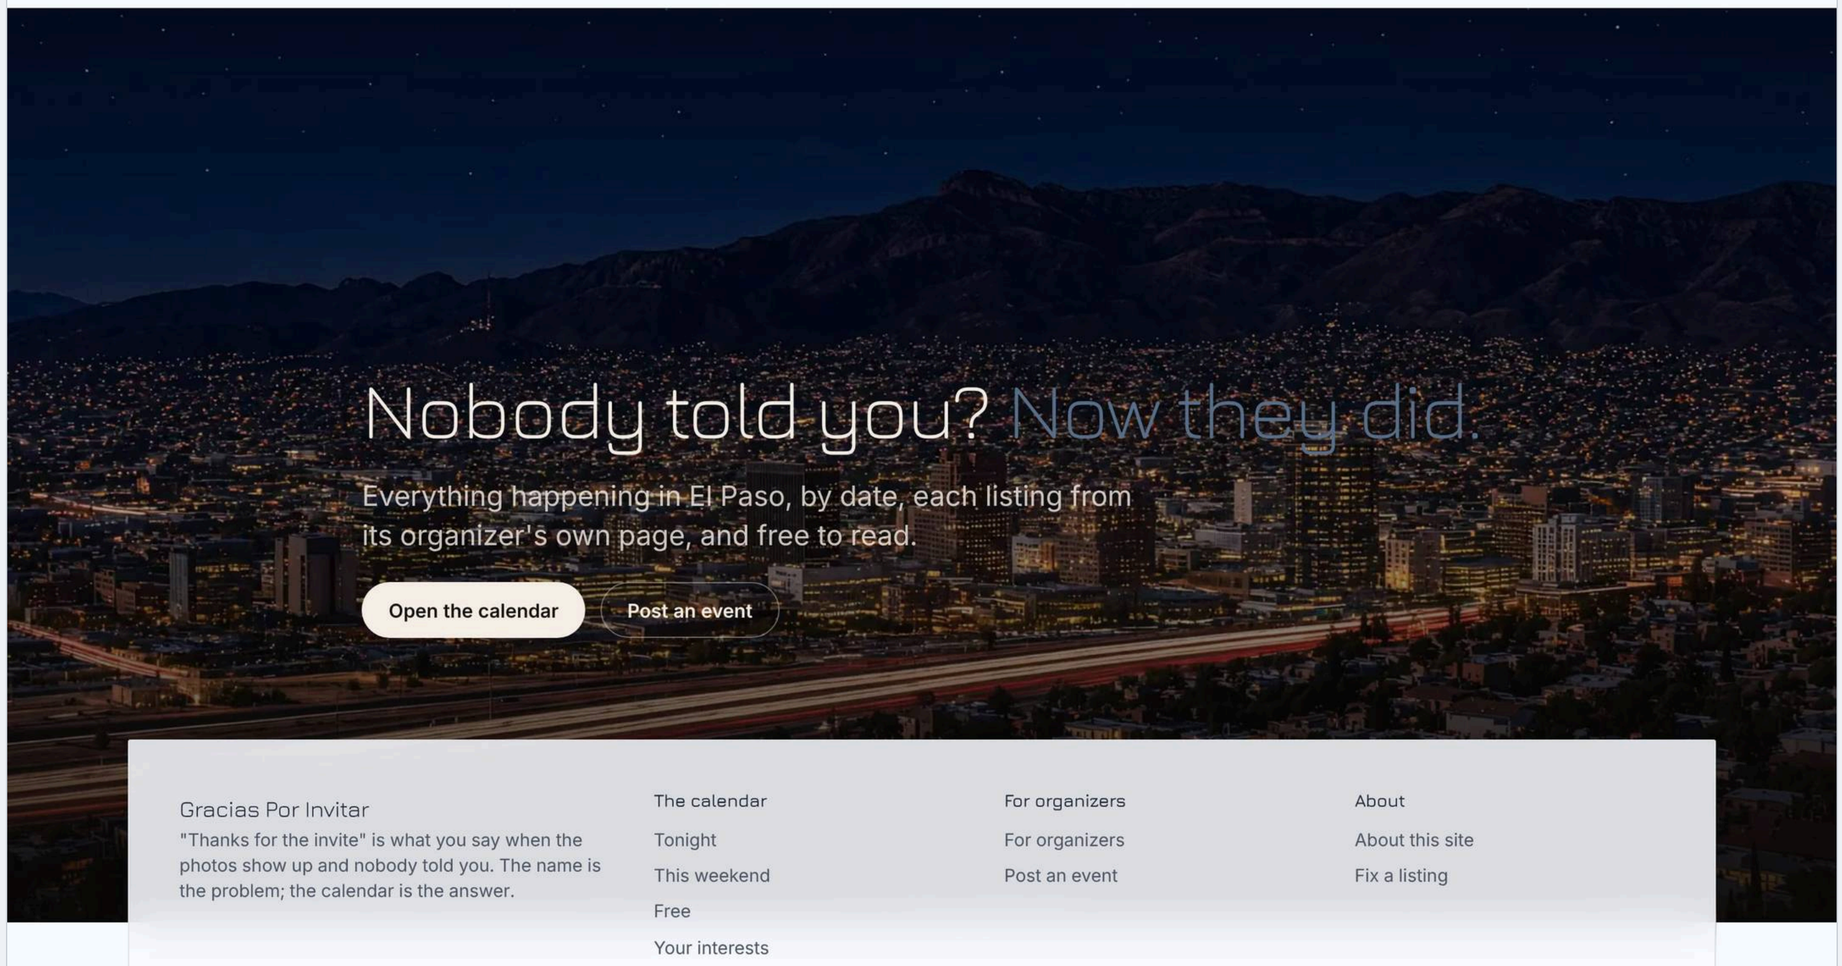

2. Six things every listing needs, three across: a head in Jura and two lines of Inter each.

3. What a listing looks like. Device photographs dressed with the site's own screens, on a band of the accent. Chips pick the slide and the caption says what it shows.

Post an event — Listed with the next weekly refresh, checked against your page.

4. The closing call says when a listing appears: with the next weekly refresh, checked against the organizer's page.

Home, 2 of 2

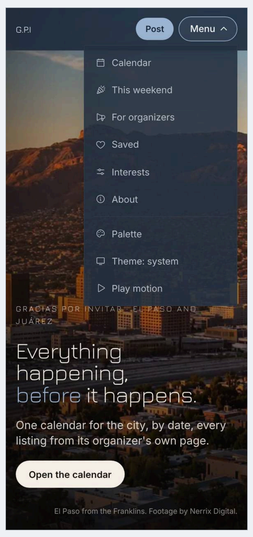

1. Inside the calendar, one category at a time, the next one showing at the edge.

2. Rows wrap: the name takes two or three lines and the time and the price hold the right edge.

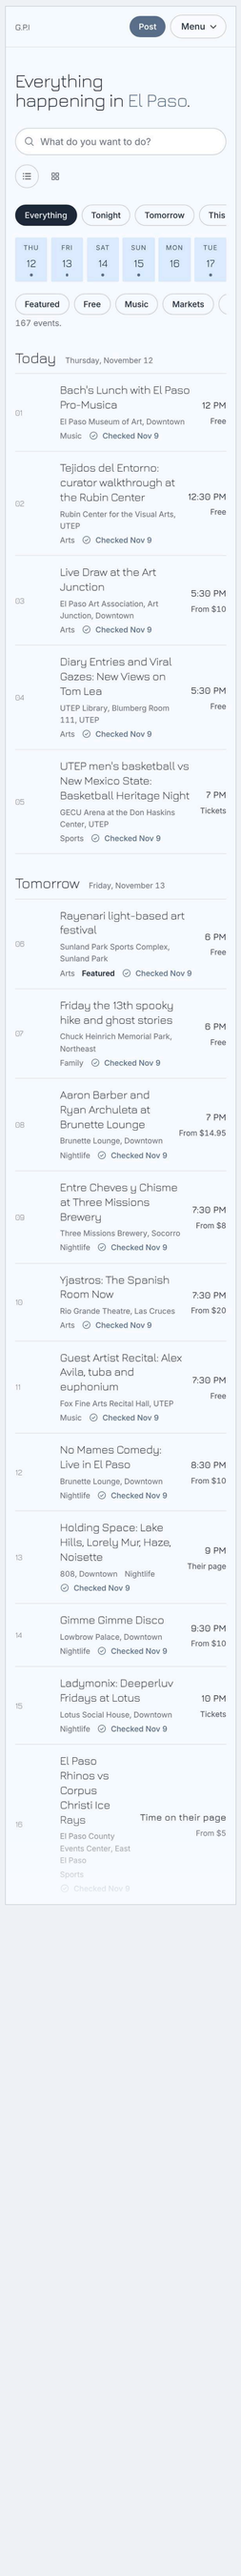

3. The doors and the footer stack in one column.

Menu open

1. Menu opens under the bar: six links with their icons, a rule, then the palette, the theme and the motion switch. It closes on Escape, a tap outside or a link.

Calendar

1. The same controls in one column. The chips and the day strip scroll sideways.

2. Rows keep the number, the name, the place, the status, the time and the price. The board shows two days; the list runs on.

Event page

1. The flyer leads at full width, then the title and the blurb.

2. The facts stack in one column.

3. The card with Save, Send to the group chat and Add to calendar follows the organizer, at full width.

4. Similar flyers, one to a row.

1. Your plan on a phone: the two actions side by side, then the days.

G.P.I Post Menu

Post it once. It stays yours.

Your page is the source. GPI lists what you post, links back to you, and shows the day it was last checked against your page. Change the place or call it off, tell us through the form, and the listing says so with the next weekly refresh.

Six things every listing needs.

They are the six things people leave a listing to find, which the field week heard four times out of four.

Who it is for
Ages, who should come, who should not. The workshop that did not say so lost its reader to another page.

What it costs
Free is a real answer, and a filter people use.

Where, exactly
Address, entrance, parking. The twenty minutes people spend checking are the listing's job.

Your page
The link people check anyway. The listing points at it instead of pretending to replace it.

Still on
Confirmed, changed or canceled, dated. The flyer that outlived its correction sent two friends to the wrong lot.

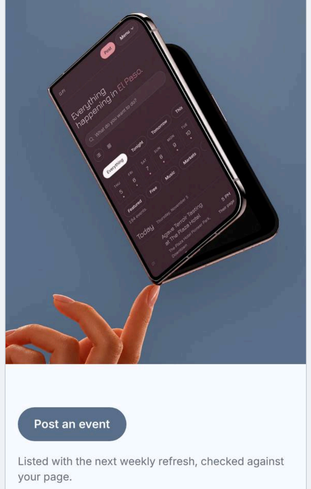

One listing
Corrected on your word, not reposted by others, so the correction travels with the event.
